Collective Memory and the Media. Memory, according to the Greeks, is the precondition of human thought (Samuel 1994). For psychologists, memory is also seen as a fundamental condition of consciousness. Not surprisingly, psychologists have constructed a variety of complex models of individual memory. However, memories also require distinct social and communicative frameworks, patterned ways of framing the flow of remembered actions, images, sounds, smells, sensations, and impressions.

On media memory. Collective memory in a new media age

There are two kinds of media with which the historical memory of a group is stabilized and transformed into an extended and continuous past: material media and performative media. Among the material media are books, photographs, films, monuments, relics, and other material carriers of signs that retain traces of the past and can serve as documentary sources in the reconstruction
